"I SUPPOSE," Deborah said indignantly, "that you could have done it better."

"Well," Gordon said, trying to be modest, "I don't say I could have done it better, but—ah—differently, shall we say?" He smiled in that slightly superior "now-let's-face-it-you-know-I-can-do-it-better" way of his that always infuriated Debbie.

Even now, after she'd promised herself that she'd stay calm when he criticized her work, so he wouldn't think what he said really upset her, she glared at him. They were looking at a painting Debbie had finished that afternoon.

"Take this line, for instance," Gordon continued, pointing to a green curve in the picture. "Don't you think it would have fitted in more smoothly if you'd curved it in the opposite direction?"

He was right, Debbie honestly had to admit it. And he was right in the other points he made about her painting as he'd been right about so many other things that she'd tried to do better than he did—or at least as well.

As Gordon talked on, making criticism after criticism, Debbie's mind wandered back over all the times she'd tried to equal him. First it had been roller skating. Debbie had moved into town just a few weeks before, and when she'd seen Gordon at school, somehow she'd wanted to meet him right away. She'd asked her girl friend, Joan, about him, and if she'd had any sense, she told herself, that's as far as it would have gone.

Joan had told her the truth, how Gordon was a pleasant fellow, except for his conceit.

Debbie had discovered that Gordon visited the rink once a week to keep himself in practice so she'd arranged to be there the very next week.

Then she'd made her fatal mistake, she realized now. She was a pretty fair skater, but she'd wanted to meet Gordon so much that, instead of skating true to her usual form, she'd pretended to be awkward and had tripped a few times. Once she'd been directly in front of Gordon, and he'd come to her rescue. She'd been thrilled, too, Debbie remembered. Gordon did have a nice smile, and he could be really fun when he wasn't showing how something should be done, but they'd definitely gotten off to a wrong start.

Because she hadn't seemed to know how to skate, Gordon had somehow assumed that she was equally deficient in other fields. Debbie had never made claim to being perfect, but up till the time she'd met Gordon, she'd always felt equal to almost any ordinary activity.

Debbie was getting desperate. She didn't want to have to tell Joan that she, too, hadn't been able to bear up under Gordon's criticisms, that she simply could not do things as well as he could. But it was true. She realized she would have an inferiority complex soon unless she hit on something to prove to Gordon that she was perfect—in something at least!

The day after the painting discussion, Debbie had her inspiration. Why hadn't she thought about it before? She'd never heard Gordon mention it, and the only reason she could think of why he hadn't was because he couldn't cook. Of course, it might be that the subject simply hadn't come up, but with any luck at all Debbie thought this would be her answer.

Immediately she invited Gordon to dinner for the following Saturday. She'd known how to cook for a long time, but she didn't intend to take any chances. Three times during the week before the fateful dinner, she insisted on trying out the meal she planned on her family. It was perfect every time, and all day Saturday Debbie prepared the dinner with loving care. Nothing must go wrong.

And nothing did, she was sure of it. Everyone, including Gordon, praised the meal, and even Gordon ate second helpings! At last, Debbie thought, she'd proved herself! Nevertheless, she wanted to hear Gordon admit that she was a perfect cook.

He still hadn't said anything when he was getting ready to go home. Debbie couldn't wait any longer. "Gordon," she asked, beaming with expectation, "did you really think my dinner was perfect?"

"Oh, yes," Gordon smiled. "Of course," he added, after a second's hesitation, as Debbie stiffened apprehensively, "the roast might have been flavored with . . ."

Debbie didn't wait to hear any more. This was the last straw! "Oh, you . . . you . . ." she gasped, but she couldn't think of anything bad enough to call him. "I suppose you think, as usual, that you could have done better!" she blurted out. "Well, I'd like to see you try it!"

Gordon seemed to pale a little, but he accepted her challeneg calmly. "Certainly," he said. "Make it next Saturday at my house."

"I'll be there," Debbie declared grimly.

All week long she became furious whenever she thought of the dinner she'd slaved over for Gordon and of his reaction to it. Apparently it didn't make any difference to him how he'd hurt her feelings by not admitting that she'd turned out a perfect meal. Apparently he didn't want to think that anyone but he could be perfect in anything.

Well, Debbie was going to teach him a lesson about feelings. She'd decided right after he left last Saturday that she didn't care if his dinner were a meal fit for kings. She'd never admit it. She was going to give him the same treatment he'd given her—even if it meant losing him. She'd tried as hard as she could not to mind when he criticized everything else, but last Saturday had been too much!

When Debbie arrived at Gordon's house, she found Gordon strangely upset. His hair was disheveled, and his face flushed. Dinner was going to be a few minutes late, he said, and led Debbie into the living room. He dashed back to the kitchen, and Debbie talked to his folks.

A half hour later he called them into the dining room. The meal, as Debbie soon discovered, was a dismal failure! It began with a watery soup, advanced to a soggy salad, an overdone roast and undercooked vegetables, and finished with a fallen cake!

Debbie was dumfounded. She'd expected the meal at least to equal hers, if not better it. How could she follow up on her plan now? Gordon's family was so obviously avoiding any mention of the dinner that Debbie didn't feel she could repeat Gordon's actions at her dinner. If she praised everything and ate second helpings, he'd realize immediately that she was merely mocking him.

No, Debbie decided, it wouldn't be fair. Gordon looked so unhappy that if she said anything, it would be just like kicking him when he was down. And he'd never done that to her. Even though he'd criticized her in practically everything, she'd never felt completely without ability. She'd have to wait for another time to teach Gordon his lesson.

All evening neither of them mentioned the dinner, and finally it was time for Gordon to walk Debbie home.

"Well, Gordon," Debbie said at her door, "the dinner was . . . I mean, I enjoyed the . . ." What could she say, she wondered, suddenly desperate. She'd forgotten she'd have to say something about the dinner before the night was over, but still it didn't seem right to say it was good when it wasn't.

Gordon came to her rescue. "Don't say it, Debbie," he said, staring at his feet. "It was awful, and don't think I don't know it."

"Well," Debbie offered, "it wasn't that bad."

"Yes, it was," Gordon said firmly. "And you've been such a wonderful sport about it that you've made me completely ashamed." Debbie's mouth fell open. This was the last thing she'd expected. Some kind of an excuse, perhaps, or nothing at all, but not this!

"I've been flying much too high," Gordon hurried on, "but I didn't realize it until tonight. You can probably do plenty more things better than I can, and . . ." the words seemed to stick in Gordon's throat for an instant, then he got them out, "and maybe you could teach them to me."

"I don't know about teaching you," Debbie murmured diplomatically, "but perhaps we could learn some new things together."

Gordon looked up then and smiled, and Debbie knew that he'd learned his lesson for good.
